ear (er) [ME., ere]. The organ of hearing, consisting of the external ear, the middle ear or tympanum, and the internal ear or labyrinth. The outer ear is made up of an expanded portion, the pinna, and the external auditory canal. The middle ear consists of the tympanum, with the ear-ossicles, the Eustachian tube, and the mastoid cells. The tympanum is lined by mucous membrane, and communicates with the pharynx by means of the Eustachian tube. It is divided into three parts—the atrium, the altic, and the antrum. Its outer end is closed by the tympanic membrane, from which sound is conducted along the ear-ossicles (the malleus, incus, and stapes) to the fenestra ovalis, which communicates with the vestibule of the internal ear. By means of the fenestra rotunda, which is closed by the entotympanic membrane, it communicates with the cochlea of the internal ear. The mastoid cells, which are also part of the tympanum, are air-spaces in the mastoid process of the temporal bone. The internal ear consists of the bony and membranous labyrinths, which are separated from each other by a space containing the perilymph. Each labyrinth consists of three parts: the vestibule, the semi-circular canals, and the cochlea. The bony vestibule communicates with the tympanum by the fenestra ovalis, closed by the base of the stapes, and also with the other parts of the internal ear. The semi-circular canals are three in number—the superior, the posterior, and the inferior. The cochlea, so named from its resemblance to a snail-shell, is a cylindrical tube that winds around a central axis, the modiolus, which transmits the cochlear nerves and blood-vessels. The cochlear canal is divided by the spiral lamina into the scala vestibuli, communicating with the vestibule, and the scala tympani, communicating with the fenestra rotunda of the tympanum. The membranous labyrinth is made up of parts corresponding to the bony labyrinth. The vestibule consists of two small sacs, the utricle and the sacculus, which communicate through the vestibular aqueduct, and are lined by an epithelium, the macula acustica, which in places is largely specialized and receives the terminations of the vestibular nerve. The membranous cochlea, or cochlear duct, contains the acoustic organ of the cochlea, or organ of Corti, which consists of a series of epithelial arches formed by the interlocking of the ends of the pillars or rods of Corti. Upon the inner rods of Corti are the inner acoustic hair-cells; in relation with the outer rods are the outer hair-cells. The organ of Corti is covered by the membrana tectoria, or Corti's membrane. e.-ache. See otalgia. e., Blainville's. See Behring's law. l. acquired. See l. active. l. active, that possessed by an individual after recovering from certain infectious diseases; or that induced by direct treatment with filtered or unfiltered cultures resulting in the production in the body of anti-bacterial or antitoxic substances. l. antitoxic, immunity against toxins. l. congenital, l. natural, that with which the individual is born. l. passive, that conferred by the introduction of antitoxins or vaccines. l. theory of, Buchner's humoral, this supposes that a reactive change has been brought about in the integral cells of the body by the primary affection from which there has been recovery, and this change is protective against similar invasions of the same organism. l. theory of, Chauveau's retention, proposed that bacteria, instead of removing certain essential food-principles from the body, left within the body certain excretory products, and that the accumulation of these products tended to prevent the subsequent invasion of the same species of bacteria. l. theory of, Ehrlich's side-chain, considers the individual cells of the body analogous in a certain sense to complex organic substances, and that they consist essentially of a central nucleus to which secondary atom-groups having distinct physiological functions are attached by side-chains such as chemists represent in their attempts to illustrate the reactions which occur in the building up or pulling down of complex organic substances. The cell-equilibrium is supposed to be disturbed by injury to any of the physiological atom-groups, as

by a toxin, and this disturbance results in an effort at compensatory repair during which plastic material in excess of the amount required is generated and finds its way into the blood. This Ehrlich regards as the antitoxin which is capable of neutralizing the particular toxin to which it owes its origin, if this is subsequently introduced into the blood. In this theory a specific combining relation is assumed to exist between various toxic substances and the secondary atom-groups of certain cellular elements of the body. The atom-groups which, in accordance with this theory, combine with the toxin of any particular disease-germ Ehrlich calls the toxiphoric side-chain. i., theory of, Emmerich and Löw's, based upon the conclusion that many bacteria generate enzymes capable of digesting the organism by which they were generated and sometimes other organisms as well. i., theory of, exhaustion hypothesis, Pasteur's theory that immunity often afforded to the tissues by an attack of infection or following vaccination against infection is due to an abstraction from the tissues by the organism concerned in the primary attack of something necessary to the growth of the infecting organism. It is opposed to the retention theory of Chauveau. i., theory of, lateral bond. See i., theory of, Ehrlich's side-chain. i., theory of, Metchnikoff's phagocytic. See under Metchnikoff.
